Millions in the former British colony have flocked to the streets in several mass protests over the past month to fight against a proposed law that would allow individuals to be extradited to stand trial in China's opaque courts.

Now, feeling emboldened by the solidarity and big turnout at recent protests, which have made headlines across the world, Hong Kongers are riding on the wave of their success to speak up on a range of issues, which are generally related to their discontent with the encroachment of China into Hong Kong.

Over the past weeks, in several different places, there have already been many smaller-scale rallies on the sidelines of the main protests, among them a couple of mothers' rallies urging the authorities to listen to young people and numerous open-air Christian gatherings urging peace.

However, many more, with different themes, are in the pipeline: There are at least five planned protests or rallies over the coming week and nine until the end of the month, and lists of these are going viral on social media.

On Saturday, thousands of people turned out for a Reclaim Sheung Shui protest in a town near the Chinese border, a show of anger against so-called parallel traders who snap up goods ranging from foreign-made baby formula to cosmetics and medicines and resell them in China.

There is to be an elderly people's march to support the young on Wednesday and a rally against pro-Beijing media in the next few weeks.

Such frequent protests are rare in Hong Kong, where people are known for their stoical work ethic in a territory that has some of the highest property prices in the world and little social welfare provision.

Many interviewed by the Observer newspaper in the Sheung Shui protest said the millions-strong anti-extradition protests last month had become a lightning rod for them.
